With the arrival of cold weather, applications are nightly received at the police station for lodging. The requests are invariably granted and sometimes as many as four or five transients are registered for the night in the bunks at other times occupied by detained offenders. Applicants are usually followers of the road, who tell the officers of long and fruitless searches for work. Not beguiled by such hard-luck stories, the officers at the police station say that the majority of visitors of this class are simply beating their way from town to town, seldom entertaining any desire for even a speaking acquaintance with manual labor.
